The Story of LEBEC

The first man through the Tejon Pass of whom we have a record was Don Pedro Fages, Commander of Militia of Alta California. This was in 1772 when he passed through searching for Indian converts who had deserted from the missions.

AT LEBEC

Four years later, in 1776, Padre Garces passed through at the end of a cross country march.

AT LEBEC

Lebec was named for Peter Lebec, a French wanderer and trapper, who was killed in 1837 by a grizzly bear that he had wounded. His companions buried him beneath the tree where he fell, and carved his name in the bark. The bark grew out and filled in the cuts; years later this section was removed from the tree, showing the name of Peter Lebec in reverse on the inside. This section of bark is now in the Beale Library at Bakersfield, California. The tree is still standing near the present highway.

AT LEBEC

Early in the Fifties, Greek George drove a camel train through the Pass. This was an experiment in military transportation and it is attributed to Jefferson Davis who was then Secretary of War. The camels were sent out to assist General Fremont and while their usefulness in the desert was slight, in the mountains they were of no use on the rough rocky trails.

AT LEBEC

Fort Tejon—one mile north—was founded in 1852 as a defense against hostile Indians. It was an important army post and the only Southern California army post that experienced a fall of snow during the winter. For this reason, Troopers from the east requested transfers to Fort Tejon.

AT LEBEC

Lebec is on the Route of the Famous Butterfield Overland Mail Route where Six-horse Stages covered the distance from San Francisco to St. Louis in twenty-three days.

AT LEBEC

In the mountains behind Lebec was the rendezvous of Joaquin Murrieta during the time he was harassing the Pueblo of Los Angeles. He left his stronghold due to the treachery of his own men and the zeal of Captain Love. He fled north and was overtaken in what was known as the Tulares, where he was killed by Captain Love.
